ISLAMABAD: The government may call an All Parties Conference (APC) to evolve a broader consensus on a two-year extension to military courts if the ongoing negotiations with opposition political parties continue to remain inconclusive, informed sources told Business Recorder.

Sources privy to the development revealed that the military has sought a two-year extension of the special courts that would enable the ongoing trials of terrorists in custody to be concluded. Through a press release on January 8, 2017, the ISPR announced that "the military courts have ceased to function on expiry of mandated period," adding "the disposal through military courts has yielded positive effects towards reduction in terrorist's activities."

This statement was followed by negotiations between the government and opposition parties on granting an extension to the of consensus: accusations by the opposition against the government that its performance has been poor with regard to judicial reforms and implementation of National Action Plan (NAP).

The sources further said the government had also planned a briefing for the opposition political parties on January 31, and would respond to their concerns and questions at that time. "If no consensus is developed, then the next option is to call an APC on the matter," said a source who requested for anonymity.

According to Lt Gen Talat Masood, a senior defence analyst, the military wants an extension in the special courts for valid reasons because the government failed to bring judicial reforms in the last two years.

According to him, a one-year extension should be given to the military courts and at the same time the government should also make legislation to strengthen the judicial system - providing protection to the prosecution and witnesses. He said "military
